

Leaders Without Titles

A New Perspective on Leadership
By Stephen J. Sampson, Ph.D.

June 10 - 13, 2013

At the Federal Protective Service, Region 10
32125 32nd Ave South, Federal Way, WA 98001

Co-sponsored by Donald Bowman, Regional Director, Federal Protective Service, and FBI – Law Enforcement Executive Development Association

Many leaders are placed in positions of power due to political connections, formal education, personal charisma, vocational experience, and/or socio-economic status. Although these criteria may have a connection with leadership ability, they often leave out the fundamentals for being a good leader: a person's personal make-up. A leader's personal inadequacies can often lead to leadership failure.

The training addresses six competencies that are critical in a person's leadership ability. They are intellectuality (how to think), sociability (how to relate to others), emotionality (how to manage emotions), personability (how to take personal responsibility), morality (how to be ethical) and physicality (how to take care of your physical fitness and well-being). And although there are relatively few people who can achieve maximum performance in each of these six competencies, a leader who knows his/her flaws in these competencies can benefit from recognizing them.
